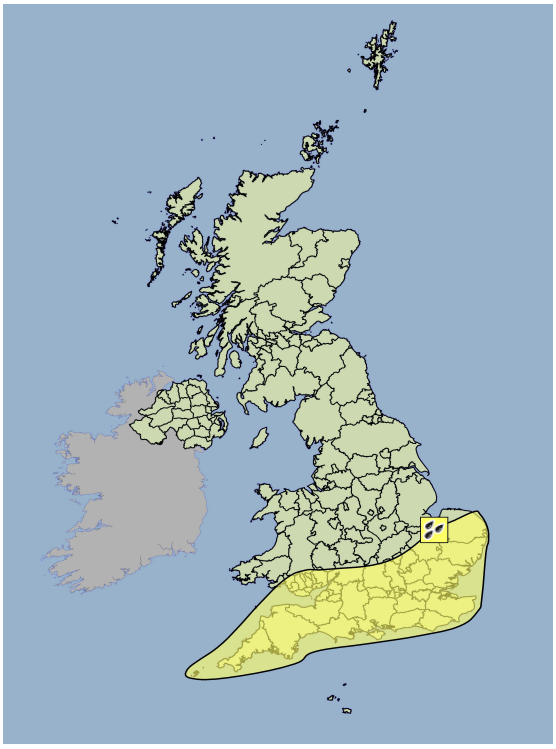
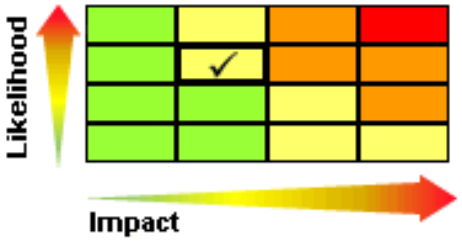
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A frontal wave is now approaching the southwest, and will bring some heavy rain to southern parts of England and southeast Wales, clearing eastward on Wednesday but slow to clear easternmost regions. Whilst there remains some uncertainty in the exact location of the heaviest rainfall, accumulations of 20-30 mm could occur quite widely within the warning area, whilst around 50 mm is possible in one or two places.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 23:10 on Tue, 25th Aug 2015 until 18:00 on Wed, 26th Aug 2015

Outbreaks of rain, heavy at times, will spread across southern England and southeast Wales overnight and during Wednesday morning, before becoming confined to parts of southeast England and East Anglia by Wednesday afternoon.

Many parts of the warning area have seen large rainfall accumulations over recent days and therefore the public should be aware that this further rain may cause minor surface water flooding and local disruption to transport.

This is an update to include parts of southeast Wales and to emphasise the clearance from all but the east of the area later on Wednesday - the warning may be trimmed back in the morning.
